** Assault tank battalions were equipped with lightly armored, open topped vehicles carrying the 7.5cm PAK 40 (in 2nd Army), or equipped with Ferdinand (in 9th Army). In the latter case they are called heavy.

*** Pz (Panzer) tank companies had remote controlled anti-tanks which carried explosive charges.

**** Mixed artillery battalions had 10cm guns and 15cm howitzers, with a total of 12 pieces in the battalion according to T/OKE.

***** Note that these panzer grenadier divisions were better equipped and had a larger organization than regular army panzer grenadier divisions.

Note: Figures include killed, wounded and missing, but non-combat losses are not included.

Source: 10-day reports from the Wehrmacht-Verlustwesen (BA-MA RW 6/3 538).

Comments: Reports were compiled 4 days after the end of the period they apply to (i.e. on the 4th, 14th and 24th each month). When units occasionally reported to late the unreported losses were included in the next report. Thus it may be assumed that some of the losses suffered by 4th Panzer Army and Army Detachment Kempf at the beginning of the Soviet offensive against Kharkov in August is included in the period 10-20 August.

The German 2nd Panzer Army HQ was withdrawn to the Dolans in August and most of its combat units were assigned to the 9th Army, hence the lack of figures for 21-31 August.

be gleaned from Table 23. They are not the worst for the 9th Army. Rather the latter part of the losses suffered by 2nd Panzer Army were even worse than the losses suffered by the 9th Army. The latter part of the losses suffered by the 9th Army were even worse than the losses suffered by the 2nd Panzer Army. The latter part of the losses suffered by the 9th Army were even worse than the losses suffered by the 2nd Panzer Army.

POWER LOSSES

Since the battle... the number of soldiers killed and twice that number wounded. This would have meant that the Red Army forces on the southern sector must have suffered 85,000 casualties.

Today more information has become available from Russia, including substantial information on losses suffered by the Red Army. The most comprehensive work on Soviet losses during World War II (and other wars) is Grif Sekretovskii Sniat, which drew upon archival records to provide much valuable information on Soviet losses during World War II (and other wars). It also contains information on Soviet strength for a large number of operations, including Kursk and much other valuable information.

This work has not escaped criticism since its publication. Possibly the most important has been articulated by H. V. Sokolov. He not only criticized Grif Sekretovskii Sniat for its lack of clarity concerning methodology, but also presents several cases of inconsistency between the figures given in the book and other kinds of sources. The argumentation...
